CH, a consonantal digraph, which in various languages (e.g. Welsh, Spanish, Bohemian) is treated as a distinct letter, placed in the Alphabet after C. In English it is not so treated formally, but in its characteristic and proper sound (tʃ) which it has in all native words, it practically adds an additional symbol to the alphabet. It has, however, in English other values; viz. those in chyle, and champagne, which might be expressed otherwise by k and sh; and that in loch, which occurs only in Scotch, Welsh, or foreign words.

The combination CH was foreign to native Roman spelling; it was introduced to represent the Greek aspirate or affricate X (as Θ, Φ, were similarly represented by TH, PH). In Latin practice, however, simple c was often substituted, e.g. χάρτης, charia, carta, χαρτέφύλλον, chærtēphylum, cærefolium, and this represented the actual pronunciation, for in the development of the Romanic languages, ch in popularized words was treated precisely as c. But in these languages, the symbol ch has been laid hold of for various purposes. In Italian it is a supplemental symbol used to indicate the hard or (k) sound of c before the vowels i and e, where c itself stands for (tʃ), as in archi (arkī) pl. of arco, chi (kī) :—L. qui. In very early French, it also occurs in the writing of some dialects, or some scribes, with the value of (k); but its typical OF. use was to represent the palatalized sound which Central Old French developed from original c (k) before a, as in L. carus, cārus, causa, OF. char, chier, chose, but which Northern Old French, on the other hand, developed from c before e and i, as in chertain, cachier, cherise, where Central Old French had c (=ts), certain, chacier, cerise. The symbol ch was not used (or only accidentally) in OE.; for, although the sound (tʃ) was already developed in English before the 10th c., it was still written c(e), as in ceosan, ceaster, fecce(e)an. But at the Norman Conquest, the symbol ch was introduced from France, and used not only for the new French words as charite, richesse, but also in the OE. words as in cheosen, chester, fecche, etc. This value of the digraph has ever since been retained in English, while in French the sound was at length worn down from (tʃ) to (ʃ), as in chief, chef, OF. (tʃ'ɛf) now (ʃ'ɛf), Eng. chief (tʃ'ɛf). Where the c was originally double, and after a short vowel, the early writing was cch, but subsequently tch, as in OE. wrecc(e)a, ME. wrecche, now wretch. After a long vowel, simple ch is used, as in coach, teach, brooch; but sometimes (from various historical causes) simple ch occurs after a short vowel, as in rich, much, and tch (rarely) after a long vowel, as in aitch. After a consonant (preserved or lost) simple ch is used, as in perch, which, such.

The sound (tʃ) also occurs in Slavonic and many non-European languages, and is usually spelt ch in words thence taken into English, as in chabouk, chark, cheetah, chints, chouse.

CH has the sound of (k) in words taken from Greek (or Hebrew through Greek) directly, or through Latin, Italian, or French, as in chasm, chimera, chirography, chyle, Rechabite. Only in a few of these, which were popular words in Romanic, e.g. cherub, archbishop, does the (tʃ) sound occur.

CH has the sound of sh (ʃ) in words from modern French; occasionally in words really from Old French, which are now erroneously treated as if from modern French, as chivalry, champaign.

CH has also the value of a guttural spirant (x); but this is not a native English sound, and is only used in English in an accurate pronunciation of Scotch, Celtic, Dutch, German, Slavonic, or Oriental words, in which the sound occurs. This sound existed in OE., but was there written h (and g) as in burh, riht; for this the Norman scribes substituted the digraph gh (burgh, right), which is still retained, though the sound was lost in the 16-17th century. The same digraph is used to represent the Irish guttural spirant in lough, Monaghan, curragh; but the Celtic languages themselves use ch (as in Welsh Machynlleth and Gaelic clachan), and this is followed in Lowland Scotch, as in loch, piobrach, broch, tocher. The Old Teutonic languages generally used h or hh for this sound, as in Goth. mahts, OS. and OHG. maht, OE. meaht; but ch (rarely hh) was introduced initially, in Upper German, for the affricated sound of c (k) as chamara (kya-māra), chirihha, chalch, whence it was extended to the spirant (x), and gradually substituted for the earlier OHG. spelling h, hh; so that this is now regularly written ch in German and Dutch; cf. Goth. ahtau, OS. and OHG. ahito, OE. eahita, mod.G. and Du. acht eight. The same symbol is used for this sound in most Slavonic languages which use the Roman alphabet, and thus sometimes in the Romanization of Russian X (Cherson, Astrachan), and also of the kindred sounds in some Eastern languages (where however kh is more general); and from all these sources it enters to some extent into English spelling, though the mere English reader usually pronounces it as (k).

As OE. c(e)-, c(i)-, has regularly become ch-, these constitute one important section of the CH-words in modern English; another consists of the Old French words in ch- from L. ca-. Of the rest, the chief are those derived from Gr. words in χ-, directly, or through L. (Italian, French) ch-. The remainder consist of a few words from Slavonic or non-European languages, or of onomatopoeic origin.

CH initial interchanges with C, K, SH. Since Old Northern French retained the ca-, which Central French changed to cha-, che-, French words were often adopted in English in both forms, usually first from Northern (Norman) French, and afterwards from Central French. Sometimes one, sometimes the other, sometimes both, of these have survived, see e.g. CATTIFF, CAMEL, CAMPION, CHAMPION, CANNEL, CHANNEL, CANAL, CHALICE, CHAMP, CATCH, CHASE, CHACOHE, CATTLE, CHATEL. The Northern English also in certain cases resisted the palatalization of OE. c, or took the parallel k form of Norse or Low German: hence northern caf, CAUK, KIRK, CARL, KEESLER, beside southern CHAFF, CHALK, CHURCH, CHURL, CHEESLER. Cf. on the other hand Kentish chal=CALF. Confusion between ch, sch, sh, was not infrequent in ME., e.g. schin=CHIN, chever=SHIVER. This was sometimes graphical, but partly also dialectal; there are varieties of northern dialect which still use initial (j) for (tʃ). Variant forms like CHAOO, SHAKO, CHAGRIN, SHAGREEN, champoo, SHAMPOO, are of more recent, and chiefly of phonetic origin.

† Ch, from dial. Obs. Aphetic form of ich, wich, southern form of the first personal pronoun I, occurring before verbal forms beginning with a vowel, h, or w; chiefly with auxiliary verbs, but also with others; as in cham (tʃam), (earlier icham) I am, cha, chave (earlier ichabbe) I have, chad I had, chard I heard, chill I will, chold, chud I would, chote I wot, etc.

Found in remains of s.e. (Kentish) dial. in 16th and early 17th c., in s.w. dialect 16-18th c., and often introduced in specimens of dialect speech in the dramatists. Now obsolete; though utichill=I will, and utichy=I were still heard in 1875, in remote parts of Somersetshire. (See Prince L. L. Bonaparte in Phil. Soc. Trans. 1875-6 p. 380.) Utichy corresponds to the 16th c. Ch; see further under Ich.

Chaff (tʃaf), sb.2 collog. [Of this and the related CHAFF v.2, the origin is not quite certain: if the sb. is earlier, it may be a fig. use of prec. (cf. senses 5, 6 there); if the vb. is the starting point, it may be a playful or light use of chaff, CHAFF v., senses 5 and 6 of which come very near to it.]

Banter, light and good-humoured railery, or ridicule, calculated to try the temper of the person to whom it is addressed; badinage. (App. of slang origin, and still somewhat vulgar.)

(The first quot. is uncertainly placed: it may mean 'scolding': cf. CHAFE v.6.)

1648 JENKYN Blind Guide iv. 76 You pretend to nothing but chaffe and scoffes. 1840 DICKENS Barn. Rudge (C. D. ed.) 42, 'I do,' said the 'pretence.' 'Honour bright. F. chaise (chaise Cotgr.)*, a phonetic alteration of chaire (so Pavie for Paris, etc.), established in the ordinary sense 'chair', whence by extension 'sedan-chair', and by transference a wheeled vehicle for travelling in. In this latter sense alone chaise passed into English, notwithstanding that chair had itself here received the same development (see CHAIR sb. 11, which however was not always an exact synonym of this word, but often used as the name of a particular sort of chaise). - (Cathedra, chair, chaise, are thus all forms of the same word.) The vulgar take (ʃɛz) for a plural sb., and form on it a singular (ʃɛ) CHAY, SHAY.

(The change of lingual r to s in French is a phenomenon widely exemplified. It appears fully established at Orleans in 15th c., but did not come down beyond 1820.)

1. A term applied to various pleasure or travelling carriages, the exact application having varied from time to time:

a. A light open carriage for one or two persons, often having a top or calash; those with four wheels resembling the phaeton, those with two the curricule; also loosely used for pleasure carts and light carriages generally.

Kersey, Bailey, Ash and Johnson explain chaise as 'a carriage for pleasure drawn by one horse'; Todd says this was the case formerly, before post-chaises were in request, and defines it as 'A chaise and pair; a chaise and four: the term of later days for a light vehicle, with four wheels, drawn by two or four horses'.

Forms: a. 4 calsydyne, calcidoine; B. 4 chalcedun, 6-8 calcedon, 7-8 chalcedon; γ. (4-5 calcedonius), 5 calsydony, calcidony, (6 chalcedonium), 7 calchedonie, calsidonie, calchidonye, 5- calcedony, 6- chalcedony. See also CASSIDONIE, -DONY. [The current form chalcedony is directly adapted from L. chalcedonium, used in the Vulgate to render Gr. χαλκηδών, in Rev. xxi. 19, the name of the precious stone forming the third foundation of the New Jerusalem, but found nowhere else. Adapted forms of the same word in OF. were calce, calcidoine, whence the ME. calcidoine, calcedun; also cassidoine, whence ME. CASSIDONIE and its varieties, which are separately treated. The 16th c. chalcedon was perh. directly from N. T. Greek.

The word is of very complicated history. The L. is commonly assumed to be the same as the adj. chalcedonius of Chalcedon in Asia Minor, as if it were 'Chalcedonian stone', but this is very doubtful. In interpreting the name in the Vulgate, which has the variant form carcedonius, the early writers identified it with a stone mentioned by Pliny xvii. §§ 103, 104, where MSS. have the variants carchedonia, charchedonia, calchedonia, carchedonia, said to be found in North Africa, and to be brought by way of Carthage (Καρχηδών), which, from the description, could have nothing to do with the chalcedony of the moderns. Isidore has carchedonia; Epiphanius de Gemmis iv, says it is produced ἐν Καρχηδόνι τῆς Λιβύης. The carchedonius or charchedonius is mentioned and moralized upon by a whole catena of writers, including esp. Bæda; but to none of them was it more than a traditional name, about which there clustered notions originally derived from Pliny with an accretion of later fables. The first to try to identify it with any known stone was apparently Albertus Magnus (1205-1282), who may have had in view some form of the stone to which the name is now given. (See the exhaustive article of Schade Altdiesches Wbch. 1363.)

A precious (or semi-precious) stone, which in its various tints is largely used in lapidary work: a cryptocrystalline sub-species of quartz (a true quartz, with some disseminated opal-quartz), having the lustre nearly of wax, and being either transparent or translucent.

It is not safe to carry the modern application back before the 16th or at earliest the 15th c.; and references to earlier notions come down to the 17th. In modern lapidary work, chalcedony receives different names according to its varieties of colour and structure, as agate, cornelian, cat's eye, chrysoprase, onyx, sard, etc. Most of the varieties were included by Pliny under his jaspis. While this was the case in English, in France itself calice was the form which came down to modern French. (OF. calis, calice was of learned origin, but early enough to undergo the phonetic change to chalice in central F.; in the struggle between the two forms, the influence of L. calix, familiar in ecclesiastical use, was effective in making calice the ultimate victor.) 2. An opaque white soft earthy limestone, which exists in deposits of vast extent and thickness in the south-east of England, and forms high cliffs along the sea-shore.

Chemically, chalk consists of carbonate of lime with some impurities. Geologically, it is a deep-sea formation composed of fragments of shells of Foraminifera, abounding in certain important animal fossils, and interspersed with nodules of flint. It is burned for lime, and prepared for writing or marking on blackboards or other dark surfaces. In 17-18th c. it is often mentioned as eaten by young women suffering from chlorosis: cf. quot. 1811.

† Chamber-deacon, -deakin, -deken, -in, -on, -ya. Obs. [app. f. CHAMBER + DEACON, though the history of the appellation is obscure.]

If sense 1 was, as it appears to be, the earlier, then the persons so called were probably really in minor orders, or at least preparing for such. It is probable that these often supported themselves by acting as domestic chaplains, or even as ordinary domestics or 'scouts' to well-to-do scholars or others willing to entertain them, and that hence arose sense 2. A University Statute quoted by Antony a Wood sub anno 1432 mentions alicius scolari, sive alicius scholaris servientis. Wood's conjecture that the word was a corruption of in camerā degentes, i.e. living not in any academical hall, but in lodgings (as non-collegiate students), belongs to pre-scientific 'etymology', but it is not easy to say whether the chamber-dekyns of sense 1 were named from living in their own chambers, or, as those of sense 2 were, from keeping the chambers of others.]

L. A name given to certain poor clerks, or poor scholars, chiefly from Ireland, who frequented the English universities (esp. Oxford) in the 15th c., and did not belong to any college or hall.

The German gave also the med. L. camerlengus, -lingus, It. camarlingo, Sp. camarleno, Pr. camarlenc. Comparing CAMERA, and CHAMBER, we see that chamberlain is a Germanic formation, kamarling, which we have received through Romanic (i. e. OFr.); but that the basis of this Germanic formation was itself a Greek word, καμάρη, which German received through Latin. Chamberling, in Ancien Riwle, appears to show assimilation to the native -ling in darling, etc., but it may have been influenced by the L. form in -lingus. (See also CHAMBERLAIN.)]

1. A saurian reptile of the genus Chamaleo, family Chamaeleonidae, small lizard-like creatures, distinguished by a prehensile tail, long tongue, eyes moving independently, and covered each with a single circular eyelid, but esp. by their power of changing the colour of the skin, 'varying through different shades of yellow, red, gray, brown, and dull inky blue' (Carpenter Zoology 1847). From their inanimate appearance, and power of existing for long periods without food, they were formerly supposed to live on air. These attributes made the name famous and familiar to many who knew nothing else of the animal.

Chamfer (tʃæmfə), sb. Also 7 chamfre. [app. ad. F. chanfrein, formerly also chanfrain, chanfrain, frin, 'a chanfering or a channel, furrow, hollow gutter, or streak in stone-work, etc.' (Cotgr.), f. OF. chanfraindre to CHAMFER. It is possible that the Fr. chanfrain directly gave the Eng. CHAMFERING, and that from this, taken as a vbl. sb., chanfer vb. and sb. were educed.

The connexion of the two senses is unexplained; sense 1 appears to be the earlier (cf. the vb. and derivatives). (Gwilt, Archit. 928, cites sense 2 from a MS. of 1475, but apparently in error.)

† 1. A small groove, channel, gutter, furrow, such as may be cut in wood or stone. Obs.

A caprifrom antelope (A. rupicapra or Rupicapra tragus), the only representative of the antelopes found wild in Europe; it inhabits the loftiest parts of the Alps, Pyrenees, Taurus, and other mountain ranges of Europe and Asia.

Its size is that of a full-grown goat; it is covered with brown hair, and has horns, about six inches long, which rise straight above the head, bending back so as to form complete hooks. Its agility and keenness of scent make its chase most difficult and exciting. (The 'chamois' of the English Bible is probably a mouflon.)

[ME. champayne, champaigne, a. OF. champaigne (= L. campānia, Sp. campaña, Pg. campaña) = It. Campānia 'plain, level country', spec. the name of the rich and level province of Italy lying south-west of the Tiber, afterwards specially distinguished as Campagna de Roma; in later Latin (e.g. by Gregory of Tours, c. 575) applied to many similar tracts, and as a common noun; f. camp-us level field.

Taken into Eng. not in the Norman or North Fr. form champaigne, but in that of central Fr. The pronunciation with tj- and stress on first syllable is exemplified already in 14th c. in alliterative verse. The same accentuation is shown by all English poets from Shakspeare to Tennyson and Browning; but occasional instances with the stress on the second syllable appear in the 19th c., and some even identify the word in pronunciation with champagne, as if it were from modern French. Webster and Worcester have this pronunciation only.

In the 16th c. there arose a variant champion, CHAMPIAN, which in the 17th c. was much more frequent than the normal form. In the 17th c. the mod.F. form champagne was introduced, and was at length established in a differentiated military sense: see CAMPAIGN.]

OF. chancelier, chancelier* = L. cancellarius usher of a law court, whose station was ad cancellos at the base or grating which separated the public from the judges (see CANCELLI, CHANCEL). The word appeared already in late OE. as cancelor (occas. canceler), evidently introduced by Edward the Confessor from Norman French cancheler; this was in 13th c. supplanted by the Central Fr. form chancelier; and this in late Anglo-Fr., and thence in 16th c. English, was erroneously spelt -our, -or, like other words properly in -er, -re, etc.: cf. ANCESTOR, and see -OR.]

[The early history of the sense lies outside English: in the Roman Empire, the cancellarius was a petty officer stationed at the bar (of lattice work) in a basilica or other law court (cf. CANCELLI, CHANCEL), as usher of the court; in the Eastern Empire he had risen to be a secretary or notary, who in later times was invested also with judicial functions. From the ancient Roman Empire, the name and office was transferred to the Western Empire, and Kingdoms, with a varying but generally increasing importance. It appears to have been introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, and became an important office under the Norman Kings, the chancellor as official secretary having superintendence of all charters, letters, and official writings of the sovereign, the custody of the royal seals, and important legal functions; see senses 1 a, 2 a. From the Roman Empire the office also passed into the church (whence sense 5), and into the mediæval order of knighthood (whence 6 b). 1875 STUBBS Const. Hist. (ed. 2) I. 352 The chancellor of the Karolingian sovereigns... is simply the royal notary... Chance-medley (tʃɑːnsˈmedli). [a. AF. chance medlée mixed or mingled chance or casualty: see CHANCE; medler is a var. of mesler to mix, mingle: see MEDDLE. From the fact that medley is also a sb., and chance medley a possible combination in the sense of 'fortuitous medley', the meaning has often been mistaken, and the expression misused.]

1. Law. Accident or casualty not purely accidental, but of a mixed character. Chiefly in Manslaughter by chance-medley (for which later writers often use chance-medley itself): 'the casual killing of a man, not altogether without the killer's fault, though without an evil intent; homicide by misadventure; homicide mixt' (Cowell).

2. The court of the Lord Chancellor of England, the highest court of judicature next to the House of Lords; but, since the Judicature Act of 1873, a division of the High Court of Justice.

It formerly consisted of two distinct tribunals, one ordinary, being a court of common law, the other extraordinary, being a court of equity. To the former belonged the issuing of writs for a new parliament, and of all original writs. The second proceeded upon rules of equity and conscience, moderating the rigour of the common law, and giving relief in cases where there was no remedy in the common-law courts. Its functions in this respect are now transferred to the Court of Appeal.

In Ireland the Court of Chancery was distinct from, but analogous in character to, the English court; but it has been similarly changed into a division of the Irish High Court of Justice.

b. Applied to similar courts elsewhere; in U.S. 'a court of equity' (Webster).

'In imitation of the High Court of Chancery in England, various local courts of equity have sprung up in the British dominions and dependencies. Some of these are called Courts of Chancery. In each of the counties palatine of Lancaster and Durham, and in Ireland, there is a court so named, which dispenses the same equity within the limits of its jurisdiction, as the High Court of Chancery.' Penny Cyc. s. v.

In others... the courts that administer equity are distinct tribunals, having their appropriate judicial officers, and it is to the latter, that the appellation courts of chancery is usually applied; but in American Law, the terms equity and courts of equity are more frequently employed.

c. Scotland. An office in the General Register House, Edinburgh (formerly called CHANCELLARY, q. v.), in which is kept a record of all writs relative to crown lands; also of crown charters of incorporation; commissions or gifts of office from the crown; service of heirs, general and special; and all writs appointed to pass the great or the quarter seal. From it are issued, in the sovereign's name, briefs of inquest regarding idiotcy or insanity, and letters of tutory and curatory.

(Established by James I on his return from his English captivity 1424, and apparently intended to be a court on the model of the English Chancery. But it was never completely organized, and after the complete establishment of the Court of Session (1534), the Chancery office was reduced practically to the function of issuing certain briefs, and recording certain writs. Cf. sense 3.)

2. Musical. A short melody or phrase to which the Psalms, Canticles, etc., are sung in public worship.

The essential characteristic of a chant is the long 'reciting-note' to which an indefinite number of syllables are sung, followed by a rhythmical cadence. The modern Anglican chant (derived from the old Gregorian) is either single or double. A single chant is sung to one verse of a psalm, and consists of two strains, of 3 and 4 bars respectively, each beginning with a reciting-note. A double chant has twice the length of a single one, and is sung to two verses.

2. The metal plate or mounting of a scabbard or sheath; particularly that which covers the point. In some early quotes, it may mean the scabbard or sheath itself.

The following explanations also occur in Dicts.; 'The transverse guard of a sword for a protection to the hand' (Fairholt, cited by Ogilvie). Johnson says 'the catch of any thing by which it is held in its place; as the hook of a scabbard by which it sticks in the belt; the point by which a buckle is held to the back strap' [citing All's Well 'the chape of his dagger']. But here the chape of a dagger appears to be confused with that of a buckle.

4. The part of a buckle by which it is fastened to a strap or belt. [So in F.]

Chapel (tʃeɪpəl), sb. Forms: 3-4 chapele, 4-6 -elle, 4-7 -eil, 3- chapel; also 4 chapaile, 5 -ylle, schapell(e), 6 chappelle, -ylle, capell, cappell, 6-8 chappell (1). [ME. chapele, a. OF. chapele (in ONF. capelle, Pr. capella, It. cappella) :- late L. cappella, orig. little cloak or cape, dim. of cappa, cloak, cape, cope (see CAP). From the cappella or cloak of St. Martin, preserved by the Frankish kings as a sacred relic, which was borne before them in battle, and used to give sanctity to oaths, the name was applied to the sanctuary in which this was preserved under the care of its cappellani or 'chaplains', and thence generally to a sanctuary containing holy relics, attached to a palace, etc., and so to any private sanctuary or holy place, and finally to any apartment or building for orisons or worship, not being a church, the earlier name for which was Oratorium, ORATORY.

The chief data for the history are: the Monk of St. Gall (Vita Car. Magni, i. 4) 'Quo nomine Francorum reges propter capam St. Martini sancta sua appellare solebant'; a charter of Childbert A. D. 710 (Capitulum De Re Dipl.) containing 'in oratorio suo seu capella S. Martini'. In the capitularies of Charles the Great (cap. v. 182) c. 800 it is used of chapels in or attached to palaces; the Laws of the Lombards (iii. iii. 22) have 'ecclesiae et capellae quae in vestra parochia sunt'.

Cappella was generally spelt capella in med.L.; the true form is evidenced not only by It. cappella, but even more by the persistence of -aph in Fr. and of -p in the other langs. Capella would have become in F. cheville; as capillus, capitrum, capistrum become cheveux, chevre, chevêtre.

3. A place of public worship of the established Church, subordinate to, or dependent upon, the church of the parish, the accommodation supplied by which it in some way supplements. These are of various kinds:

a. Chapel of ease: a chapel built for the convenience of parishioners who live far from the parish church. Also fig.

b. Parochial chapel: the place of worship of an ancient division of a parish attached to it by custom and repute, as e.g. in the case of the numerous divisions of the parish of Kendal, and other large parishes of the Lake district; District chapel, that of a modern 'district' or division of a parish constituted under the Church Building Acts, from 59 Geo. III. c. 134, onwards. To both of these the name CHURCH is now commonly given, except in remote districts or special instances.

Dict.* 13 It is to be regretted that countenance to the assumption of the name of chapel for their place of assembly on the part of dissenters, is too often given by our designating as churches many of the new sanctuaries, which are, in fact, only chapels. 1842 BURN Eccles. Law (ed. g) I. 306 The last species of chapels, those erected under the authority of the various Church-Building Acts, and usually designated District Chapels. 1855 HY. MARTINEAU *Eng. SEDGWICK (title), Memorial by the Trustees of Cowgill Chapel. 1873 PHILLIMORE Eccles. Law II. 1824 A parochial chapel is that which has the parochial rights of christening and burying; and this differs in nothing from a church, but in the want of a rectory and endowment.

c. Free chapel: a chapel not subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary, having been founded by the king or by a subject specially authorized by him.

1523 Act 14 & 15 Hen. VIII., c. 9 The Deane and Chapter . . . of the free chapel of the kyng, of Saint Martins le grande. 1545 Act 37 Hen. VIII., c. 4 There have been divers Colleges, Free Chapels, Chantries, Hospitals, Fraternities. 1672 Cowell's Interpr., Free Chapel, Libera Capella . . . the King may Licence a Subject to found such a Chapel, and by his Charter exempt it from the Diocesan Jurisdiction. 1726 AVULFE Parerg. 165. 1873 PHILLIMORE Eccles. Law II. 1824 The king himself visits his free chapels . . . and not the ordinary.

d. Proprietary chapel: one that is the property of private persons.

1873 PHILLIMORE Eccles. Law II. 1183 Proprietary chapels . . . are anomalies unknown to the ecclesiastical constitution of this kingdom, and can possess no parochial rights . . . Dr. Lushington said. . . the ancient canon law of this country knew nothing of proprietary chapels or unconsecrated chapels at all. . . The necessity of the times . . . gave rise to the erection of chapels of this kind, and to the licensing of ministers of the Church of England to perform duty therein. Ibid. II. 1834 It is at any time competent to the proprietors of an unconsecrated chapel to convert it to secular purposes.

4. Applied to places of Christian worship other than those of the established church of the country: e.g. to those of Roman Catholics in Great Britain and Ireland, and of the Episcopal Church in Scotland; of the Nonconformists ejected in 1662; of Methodists since the 18th c., and, recently, of Protestant Dissenters generally (in England and Wales).

These uses go back to a time when 'church' had still its historical value of the endowed place of worship of a parish, with its beneficed rector or vicar, tithes, etc., and when no other place of worship, whatever its architecture, ritual, or communion, was thought of as the 'church'. Of R. C. chapels the earliest mentioned were those of foreign ambassadors, and Roman Catholic queens of the Stuarts (see sense 2a); in the 18th c., and down to 1830-40, 'chapel' was the regular name, as it is still in Ireland. The name first used by Protestants separating from the Church of England was app. 'meeting-house'; but the places of worship founded by the non-conforming clergymen ejected in 1662 were commonly 'chapels'; after that, 'meeting-house' and 'chapel' were used more or less synonymously by Protestant Dissenters; the former became the prevailing name in the 18th c., but was mostly abandoned for 'chapel' in the first half of the 19th c. (except by Quakers). For his connexion, Wesley introduced 'preaching-house'; but Methodist Churchmen appear to have preferred 'chapel'; and it was in the sequel often used by Wesley as = 'preaching-house', and gradually took its place. During the present century, the custom of applying 'church' to the parochial and district chapels of the Church of England, has been followed by the use of 'church' for 'chapel' by Roman Catholics, Scotch Episcopalians, and many Nonconformists. (See CHURCH.) But the earlier usage has made chapel in Ireland the common appellation of the R. C. places of worship and service, as distinguished from those of the Protestant (Episcopal) Church; and in England and Wales of nonconformist places of worship or service, as distinguished from those of the Church of England. Hence such combinations as chapel-goer, chapel-going, chapel-people, etc.

4. A duly constituted general meeting or assembly of the canons of a collegiate or cathedral church, of the members of any monastic or religious order, or of an order of knights, for consultation and transaction of the affairs of their order.)

[From the last-mentioned usage (the capitula of a monastic rule) coupled with the practice of reading a capitulum or chapter of the Rule, or (as was St. Augustine's practice) of the Scriptures, to the assembled canons or monks, the assembled canons or monks themselves came to be called in a body the capitulum or chapter, and their meeting-place the chapter-house. Dict. Chr. Antig. I. 288/1; cf. Du Cange and Littré. More exactly the name chapter was first transferred to the meeting, and then to those who met. The transference was easy through such expressions as ire or convenire ad capitulum, to go to (the reading of) the capitulum or chapter, to go to the meeting.]

[The first element is of uncertain origin; from the earliest instances it appears to be char; charke, cherke, found from beg. of 16th c., being app. due to erroneous analysis of the spoken word, and having no independent origin or meaning, though afterwards (in 17th c.) used as an independent word. A current suggestion is that char is an application of CHARE v. or sб. 1, as if turn-coal, i. e. wood turned or converted into coal; but for this no actual evidence has been found.

The name 'coal' itself originally meant 'charcoal' (collier being a 'charcoal-burner'), and no satisfactory explanation appears of the introduction of the name charcoal in the same sense, esp. as there is no contemporary reference to 'earth-coal', 'stone-coal', 'pit-coal', or 'sea-coal' (as mineral coal was, for various reasons, called). See COAL.]

Charge (tʃɑːdʒ), v. Forms: 3- charge; also 4 charge, charge, 5 charg, 6- Sc. charge. [a. OF. charge-r, -ier, 11th c. in Littré (= ONF. carguer, cargier, Pr. cargar, Sp., Pg. cargar, It. carricare):—L. carricare (in Jerome) to load, f. carr-us car, wagon; cf. communicare to share in common, caballicare to ride, etc.]

(Several forms resulted in Romic from the L. type carricare. When the original vb. in sense 'load' was synopated at an early period to carricare (cf. It. carricare, carricare), this gave OF. karkier, charchier (cf. L. caballus horse, caballicare, caballicare to ride, F. chevaucher); thence ME. CARK and CHARCHE. Otherwise, carricare became carrigare, and was then synopated to cargare, OF. cargier, chargier, Eng. CHARGE. After these changes had taken place, and the original verb had become Romic carricare, cargare, a new carricare was formed in the sense 'to convey in a car', 'to cart', and this gave OF. careyer, carier, charier (cf. manus hand, manicare to handle, F. manier); thence Eng. CARRY.]

I. To load; to cause to bear, hold, or receive. (To charge is, in sense, causal of to bear; hence in the passive charged with is equivalent to 'bearing', 'taking', or 'receiving', what it can bear or hold.)

Charity (tʃærɪti). Forms: a. 2 carited, karitep, -teb; β. 2-6 charite, cherite, 4-5 cheryte, 4-6 charyte, charitee, 4-7 charitie, 4- charity. [Two early types of this word appear in Eng.: (1) carited, -teb, (2) charitē; these are adoptions respectively of ONF. caritēdā, -teb(β), (later, and mod.Pic. caritē), and the somewhat later central OF. charitē (earlier charitē); which correspond to Pr. caritat, Sp. caridad, It. carità, semi-popular adaptations of L. cāritāt-em in its theological sense. In truly popular use L. cāritāt-em had already become, through pop. Lat. **caritāt-em*, Pr. cariat, ONF. kieritē, OF. chieritē, mod.F. cheritē. But this had the general Latin senses of 'dearness (high price), fondness, affection', as well as those belonging specially to New Testament and Christian use; subsequently, to indicate the latter more distinctly, the Latin word, familiar in the language of the church, passed anew into popular use, and undergoing (from its later date) less phonetic change, gave caritat, caritet, charitet, charitē. Mixture of the two forms gave the type cheritē, and, in Eng. at least, the two words were not kept altogether distinct in use. See CHERTÉ.

The Greek word for 'love' in the N. T. (occasionally also in LXX) is ἀγάπη, from root of vb. ἀγαπάω 'to treat with affectionate regard', 'to love'; in the Vulgate, ἀγάπη is sometimes rendered by dilectio (noun of action f. diligere to esteem highly, love), but most frequently by caritas, 'dearness, love founded on esteem' (never by amor). Wyclif and the Rhemish version regularly rendered the Vulgate dilectio by 'love', caritas by 'charity'. But the 16th c. Eng. versions from Tindale to 1611, while rendering ἀγάπη sometimes 'love', sometimes 'charity', did not follow the dilectio and caritas of the Vulgate, but used 'love' more often (about 86 times), confining 'charity' to 26 passages in the Pauline and certain of the Catholic Epistles (not in 1 John), and the Apocalypse, where the sense is specifically 1 c. below. In the Revised Version 1881, 'love' has been substituted in all these instances, so that it now stands as the uniform rendering of ἀγάπη, to the elimination of the distinction of dilectio and caritas introduced by the Vulgate, and of 'love' and 'charity' of the 16th c. versions.]

1. Christian love: a word representing caritas of the Vulgate, as a frequent rendering of ἀγάπη in N. T. Greek. With various applications: as † a. God's love to man. (By early writers often identified with the Holy Spirit.) Obs.

3. A disposition to judge leniently and hopefully of the character, aims, and destinies of others, to make allowance for their apparent faults and shortcomings; large-heartedness. (But often it amounts barely to fair-mindedness towards people disapproved of or disliked, this being appraised as a magnanimous virtue.)

App. a restricted sense of 1 c, founded upon one of the special characteristics ascribed to Christian charity which 'thinketh no evil': 1 Cor. xiii. 6; cf. also 1 Pet. iv. 8 'Charity shall cover the multitude of sins'.

[OE. Carles wægn the wain (wain, plaustrum) of Carl (Charles the Great, Charlemagne). The name appears to arise out of the verbal association of the star-name Arcturus with Arcturus or Arthur, and the legendary association of Arthur and Charlemagne; so that what was originally the wain of Arcturus or Boötes ('Boötes' golden wain' Pope), became at length the wain of Carl or Charlemagne. (The guess charl's or carle's wain has been made in ignorance of the history.)]

The asterism comprising the seven bright stars in Ursa Major; known also as The Plough.

As the name Arcturus was formerly sometimes applied loosely to the constellation Boötes and incorrectly to the Great Bear, the name Carlewagne-sterre occurs applied to the star Arcturus.

6. The chase-guns of a ship (cf. BOW-CHASE, -CHASERS); the part of the ship where the chase-ports are. Stern chase: the chase-guns in the stern.

1622 R. HAWKINS Voy. S. Sea (1847) 184 The vice-admirall . . . began with her chace to salute her with three or foure peeces of artillery, and so continued chasing her and gunning at her. Ibid. 190 Doubtlesse it is most proper for shippes to have short ordinance, except in the sterne or chace. 1627 CAPT. SMITH Seaman's Gram. xii. 55 Her Bow and chace so Gally-like continued, should beate as many Ordnances as . . . she could. Ibid. xiii. 60 To giue her also your full chace, your weather broadside. 1687 London Gaz. No. 2251/4 Whilst our Stern Chace so galled the rest a Stern. 1748 ANSON Voy. III. viii. 501 The galeon returned the fire with two of her stern-chace. 1795 London Gaz. 3 Feb., Firing at each other their bow and stern chases.

7. Tennis. Applied to the second impact on the floor (or in a gallery) of a ball which the opponent has failed or declined to return; the value of which is determined by the nearness of the spot of impact to the end wall. If the opponent, on sides being changed (see quot. 1653), can 'better' this stroke (i.e. cause his ball to rebound nearer the wall) he wins and scores it; if not, it is scored by the first player; until it is so decided, the 'chase' is a stroke in abeyance.

Since the distance of the place of impact from the wall is the point of value, the common explanation in Dictionaries is 'The place where the ball completes its first bound'.

|| Chaste, v. Obs. [The two M.E. verbs chast-en and chast-en (CHASTY) appear both to originate from OF. chastie-r:—L. castigare to make chaste or pure, correct, chastise, f. cast-us CHASTE. The OF. vb. was adopted in 12th c. Eng. as chastien: in early southern Eng., where the OE. weak verbs in -igan still retained -ien in the infinitive, as OE. lufigan (3rd s. lufed), M.E. luvien (3rd s. luvelh), later luvi, luvy, luw-en, luw-e, the -ien of chastien was apparently treated in the same way, giving chast-y, chast-en, chast-e. But in those dialects in which lufigan was already reduced to luw-en, chasti- was recognized as the stem of chasti-en, and gave later chasty-e, chasty. Hence in 13th and early 14th c., chasti is the infinitive of chaste, or the stem of chasty, according to dialect.]

6 chastese), 6-9 chastize, 4- chastise. [An equivalent of the earlier CHASTE and CHASTY, the formation of which is not easily accounted for.

There is no recorded med.L. castisare, F. chastiser, and no OF. chastir, chastiss-, the usual sources of

-ise, -ize in English verbs; the word is too early to be a simple English formation from CHASTE a.

+ -IZE. The stress was originally always on the first syllable chastise; is generally so with Shakspeare (7 times against 2), and also in later poets, as still in chastisement; but already in Chaucer sometimes, and Gower often, on the second, as now.

If chastise was in some way altered from chasty, the alteration has not been accounted for. If the sb. chastice had been more frequent or of earlier date in the language, it might have been suggested that the verb was formed on it.]

Chasuble (tjæ'siəb'l). Forms: 4-6 che-sible; also 4 -eble, cheisible, 4-5 chesyble, 5 -sibil, -oiple, -siple, -syppyl, -ylle, 5-6 chesybyll, 6 chisabile; 5 chesabyll, -pyll, 6 che-sable, -sabbell; 5 che-suble, che-suble, 6 che-suble, 7- chasuble. [ME. chesible was a. OF. chesible (cf. med. L. casibula); the current form, which has taken its place since 1700, corresponds to mod. F. chasuble (casuble 13th c. in Littré), and to the med. L. casubula (casubula, casubula, etc.); these go back respectively to late L. types **casipula*, **casupula* (in It. casipola and casupola little house, poor cottage, cot, hut), popular forms used instead of the literary L. casula, dim. of casa 'cottage, house'; meaning originally 'little house, cot', but also, already in Augustine (c 400), the ordinary name of an outer garment, a large round sleeveless cloak with a hood, according to Isidore (XIX. xxi. 17) 'vestis cucullata, dicta per diminutionem a casa, quod totum hominem tegat, quasi minor casa'.

(Casipula from casa has been compared to manipulus 'little band' from manus. The literary casula appears to have left no representative in mod. Romanic langs.; the OF. chasule, casule (casura), Sp. casulla, point to the secondary diminutive casulula (see Du Cange).

As an article of dress, casula appears to have been a popular or provincial name for the pallula of classical Latin, a garment consisting of a circular piece of cloth with a hole in the centre for the head, worn in cold or rainy weather, by peasants in the fields, travellers, etc.; as the most ordinary of garments, it was worn by the monks, and by the Council of Ratisbon, 742, was decreed to be the proper dress of the clergy out of doors. For the supervestment worn in sacerdotal offices, the ordinary name from 5th to 8th c. was planeta; 'the earliest undoubted instance of casula so used (in Sacramentary of St. Gregory) dates from the 9th c., or possibly the 8th' (Dict. Chr. Ant.). But it at length supplanted the earlier names planeta, amphibolum, infila; and in English chasuble has this sense only.]

Chaw (tʃɔ), v. (now vulgar). Also 6-7 chaw. [A by-form of CHEW (OE. clowan), found since 16th c. The form is not easily accounted for, but it agrees with mod.Du. kawwen, Ger. kauen, L.G. kauen, kawen, as distinct from MHG. küwen, OHG. chiswan, MDu. küwen; and it is not far phonetically from another variant chow, choue, used in Eng. in 16th c. and now in Sc. and some Eng. dialects; see CROW. Chaw was very common in 16-17th c.; it occurs in Udall, Bradford, Levins, Golding, Marbeck, Baret, Breton, Drayton, Marston, Dekker, Topsell, Donne, Ben Jonson, Markham, Boyle, Fuller, Cogan, Harris, etc. in addition to the authors cited below. It is now esteemed vulgar, and is used of coarse or vulgar actions, as 'chawing' tobacco.

[A suggested explanation of the form is a possible passing of the OE. clowan, claw, ciewon, cowen, into another conjugation, as ceawan, clow, ceawen; but as no trace of the chaw form occurs before 1530, this seems unhistorical.]

[A common Teut. sb.: OE. céap 'barter, buying and selling, market, price, merchandise, stock, cattle', = OFris. kāp, OS. kōp (MDu. coop, Du. koop, LG. koop), OHG. chouf, MHG. koif trade, buying and selling, merchandise, gain, payment (Ger. kauf purchase):—WGer. **kaup*:—OTeut. **kaupo*-s masc.; cf. ON. kaup bargain, pay, wages (Sw. köp, Da. køb bargain, purchase, price), neut.:—**kaupom*. The original sense was 'bargaining, barter, exchange of commodities', whence, after the use of money, 'buying and selling'; 'buying or selling', in later times often restricted to 'buying, purchase' alone. Beside it, the Teut. langs. have the derivative verbs, **kaupjan* (OHG. chouffen, OE. clēpan), and **kaupōjan* (Goth. kaupon, OHG. choufjan, OE. clēpian) to barter, buy and sell, etc. (see CHEAP v.), and OHG. an agent-sb. choufo, WGer. type **kaupo*, -on, trader, merchant. OE. is the only language in which the sb. has the sense 'cattle', so that there is no ground for taking that as the original sense; it was either, like the word CATTLE itself, a special application of the general sense 'merchandise, stock', or perhaps connected with the use of cattle as a medium of exchange or measure of value; cf. FEE.

The coincidence of the stem kaup-, and esp. the identity of the WGer. agent-sb. **kaupo*, -on 'trader, merchant, dealer', with L. caupo, -um 'petty tradesman, huckster, tavern keeper', has suggested that the Teut. word and its family are of Latin origin. But there are serious difficulties.

Some, taking the Goth. vb. kaupatan 'to cuff' as a deriv. of the same root, suggest for kaup- the original sense of 'stroke, striking': compare the notion of 'striking' a bargain, 'striking hands' over a bargain, Ger. handschlag.

Chechin, obs. form of CHEQUEN.

Cheicle, obs. form of CHASUBLE.

Check (tʃek), int. & sb. Forms: 4-6 chek, (4 cheke, cheekke, 4-5 chekke, 5 chioke, chak), 6-9 cheoque, 7-9 cheque, (7 cheque), 4- check. [ME. chek, chak, aphetic f. **eschek*, -chak, a. OF. eschec, -ek, -eg, eschac, in ONF. eschec, escac, Pr. escac, It. scacco 'check' in chess, med. L. scaccus, scāchus; cf. also the parallel forms Sp. jaque, OSP. xaque 'check', Pg. xaque 'check' and 'shah' (of Persia). Adapted form (immed. from Arabic) of Pers. شاه shāh 'king', also the 'King' in chess; in this specific sense the Pers. word was taken into Arabic, where arose the phrase شاه مات shāh māt(a), 'the King is dead', i.e. can make no further move: see CHECKMATE.

(This has been taken back into Persian in the form shāh māt gardad = the shāh becomes māt.) In a MS. written in Sevilla in 1283, shāh is made in OSP. xaque (x = sh), and shāh māt(a) appears as xaque mate. But the adoption of the words in Romanic took place some centuries earlier, the common Romanic form taken by shāh being scāc, scacc, as in the med. L., It., Pr., and Fr. forms given above. Thence also the MHG. schāch, Ger. schach, Du. skach, Icel. skák, Da. skak, Sw. schack 'check' and 'chess' (in the latter sense also schach-spiel, skakspil, etc. = check-play). The general meaning in Romanic is 'check'; for the name of the game the plural is used in med. L. scacci, It. scacchi, Pr. escacor, F. échecs: see CHESS.

From its use in chess the word has been widely transferred in French and English. In the sense-extension the sb. and vb. have acted and reacted on each other, so that it is difficult to trace and exhibit the order in which special senses arose.]

A. int. A call at chess by which notice is given to the opponent that a move has been made which exposes his King; one says also Check to your King! and even Check to your Queen! Also fig.

 † Check-rook: the call of check when at the same time one of the rooks is threatened with capture.

Has been conjectured to be the same word as prec., the animal having possibly been in repute as a rennet. Against this is the consideration that this word belongs (now at

Chemise (ʃmīz). Forms: a. 1 cemes, 4 kemes, kemse; b. 2, 6, 8-9 chemise. [Two types of this word appear in Eng., both ultimately derived from late L. : (1) OE. ceges (? fem.), early ME. kemes, kemse :-prehistoric OE. type **camisja*-, from the late L. word; (2) chemise, a. O. and mod.F. chemise (ONF. camise, quemiise, kemise, Pr. and Sp. camisa, Pg. camisa, It. camiscia, camicia) :-late L. camisia, camisa shirt, surplice (see Du Cange).

L. camisia appears first in Jerome c 400 (Ep. Vest. Mnl. 64 n. 11 'volo pro legentis facilitate abuti sermone vulgato; solent militantes habere lineas, quas camistas vocant'). It is also in Sallust Law (lviii. 4 camisia, and camisat, Isidore (xix. xxi. 1, xxii. 29 'Camistas (v. r. camistas) vocant, quod in his dormimus in camis, id est stratis nostris'). Beside it is found the deriv. camistile, -is, camistile, OF. camistil, chamistil fine linen, alb, etc. (see CHAISEL); also an uncertainly related camis, It. camice, OF. cauisse, chamice, 'alb'.

The ulterior history and origin of camisia are uncertain. German etymologists incline to consider it adopted from Teutonic, and related to OE. ham shirt, and Ger. hemd, OHG. hemidi, Gothic type **hamtīpi*, f. root ham to cover, clothe. Kluge supposes a derivative **hamisja*-, which, if it existed, might perh. give a Romanic camisia, as German h gave c in OFrench, through Frankish ch. But besides other difficulties, no traces of the required word are actually found in any Teutonic lang., the nearest thing being ON. hamis masc. (-hamisjo-s) snake's slough. The Irish camisuse, Cornish camis, Bret. kanpis an alb, and MCorn. camise an article of female clothing, are all adopted from L. or French.]

1. A garment: the name has been variously applied at different times; perh. originally (as still in French and other Romanic languages) the undergarment, usually of linen, both of men and women, a shirt; but now restricted to that worn by females, formerly called 'smock' and 'shift'. †Formerly also applied to some under garment distinct from the 'smock', as well as to a priest's alb or surplice (so med.L. camisa), the robe of a herald, etc. a. c 1050 Gloss. in Wr. 4. popularly and commercially. One who deals in medicinal drugs. (Not in U.S.; in Scotland also, druggist is the ordinary term.)

In Great Britain, the use of the terms chemist-and-druggist and pharmaceutical chemist is now regulated by the Pharmacy Acts of 1852, 1868, 1869; a pharmaceutical chemist (pharmacist, pharmacist) is a person who has passed the higher examination of the Pharmaceutical Society, which qualifies for membership, under the provisions of section 10 of the act of 1852; a chemist and druggist is a person who has passed the minor examination under the provisions of section 6 of the act of 1868, or who was actually in business when the act of 1868 was passed. No other person than these is legally entitled to use the name chemist (or druggist) in any connexion for trading purposes.

3. That branch of physical science and research, which deals with the several elementary substances, or forms of matter, of which all bodies are composed, the laws that regulate the combination of these elements in the formation of compound bodies, and the various phenomena that accompany their exposure to diverse physical conditions.

Chemistry is thus at once a science and an art; the latter, called applied or practical chemistry, is that referred to by the earlier authors and explained in early dictionaries.

Cheque, check (čjek). Banking. [Cheque is a differentiated spelling of check, which is also in use, especially in U.S. In meaning it belongs to CHECK sb. sense 13. Cf. also CHECK v. sense 16. From being the name of the counterfoil of an Exchequer or other bill, the purpose of which was to check forgery or alteration, the name appears to have been applied to any bill, note, or draft, having a counterfoil, and thus to its present sense, where a counterfoil (though usual) is not even necessary.]

1706 Act 5 Anne c. 13 [Enacts that Exchequer Bills be made henceforth with two counterfoils instead of one, and] That the said Governor and Company [of Bk. of Eng.] shall . . . have the use and custody of the one part of all and every the Cheques, Indents, or Counterfoils of all such Exchequer Bills . . . and from which the same Exchequer Bills shall be cut. 1708 Act 7 Anne c. 7 Such part of the said Cheques, Indents, or Counterfoils as shall relate to the Bills so discharged or cancelled . . . shall be delivered back into the Receipt of Her Majesties Exchequer by the said Governor and Company. [Cf. Mr. A. W. Chisholm's Return to Ho. of Commons, ordered 21 May 1857, on National Debt.] 1755 JOHNSON, Check, the correspondent cipher of a bank bill. 1774-82 BARCLAY Dict., Check . . . a counter-cypher of a bank bill; an account kept privately to examine that which is kept with a banker, or public office.

Hence Cheque-note, a 'note' having a counterfoil.

1721 Minutes of Court of Bank of England 4 Jan., The affidavit of John Jocelyn of, relating to a cheque note for a Dividend Warrant on Bank Stock pawned.

2. A draft form having a counterfoil. Obs.

1717 Minutes of Court of Bank of Eng. 24 Oct., Ordered . . . that Mr. Woolhead desire all persons who keep accounts by Drawn Notes to use cheques, who do not at present. 1765 Ibid. 19 Dec., Ordered that no cheques be delivered but to Persons keeping Cash with the Bank, or to their order in writing, or to their known servant, bringing with him the Bank Book; and that the servant be desired to write his Master's name and his own in a leaf of the Cheque Book, against the number of cheques delivered him, and that the Bank Officer do write the number of the said cheques with the day when delivered signed with his own name in a spare leaf of their Bank Books. That the name and place of abode of every person demanding payment of Bank Draughts be wrote on the Back thereof before the Draughts be paid. 1832 in Lawson Hist. Banking (1850) 186 Cheques are given out in books, and not in sheets as heretofore.

This was apparently the sense in which Tucker used chequed paper (which could not mean chequered or patterned paper, as none such was ever used by the Bank of Eng.): 1765 TUCKER Lt. Nat. I. Gen. Good, If I have an account with the Bank of England, and . . . should I chance on some distant journey to be reduced low in pocket, if I have no checked paper along with me, I cannot draw for a single expense.

8. A written order (on a printed form or otherwise) to a banker by a person having money in the banker's hands, directing him to pay, on presentation, to bearer or to a person named the sum of money stated therein (called in Bank of England books 1717 a Drawn Note.) Blank cheque: (usually) a cheque signed by the drawer, but with the amount left blank to be filled up by the person to whom it is given.

Quot. 1774 may possibly belong to 7, or a. 1774. Foots Coseners m. i. A draft! A draft on his banker, I reckon. . . Let me see. What is the tot? II. The Exchequer.

Of the origin of this application of the word various more or less conjectural explanations have been offered: the earliest is that given in the Dialogus de Scaccario or Dialogus concerning the Exchequer, written in 1178 'by Richard Bishop of London the Treasurer, son of Bishop Nigel the Treasurer, and great-nephew of the justiciar Roger of Salisbury' (Stubbs). According to this the scaccarium (chequer or eschequer) of the King was a quadrangular table, covered with a black cloth marked with transverse lines a foot or a palm apart, and having 'calculi' in the spaces; it was presumed to be so called from its likeness to a chequer or chess-board.

†5. The table which gave its name to the King's Exchequer; any table for accounts, a counter. Obs. 1178 Dial. de Scaccario in Madox Exchequer App. Scaccarium tabula est quadrangula. Cherry (tʃeri), sb. Forms: a. i cyrs, ciris; B. 4 chiri(e, 4-7 chery(e, 5 cheri, chere, chere-ree, chiry, 6 chirrie, (cheryse), 6-7 cherie, cherrie, 6- cherry. [The OE. name ciris, cyrs (known only in comb.) was cogn. with OHG. chirsa, chessa (MHG. hirse, herse, mod.G. hirse), OLG. **kirs*a (MDu. kerse, Du. kers, Fl. keerne), all repr. earlier (f. WGer.) **kirs*a:—**kirs*a, adoption of a pop. L. **ceresia*, **ceressa*, which was also the progenitor of the Romanic forms It. ciriagia, Sp. cereza, Pg. cereja, Pr. cereisa, cereira, F. cerise (cf. med.L. ciresum). The ME. chery, chiri is not known till 14th c.; it was probably derived from ONF. cherise (still used in Northern France), inferred to have given an early ME. cherise, cheris, which was subseq. mistaken for a plural in -s, and a singular cheri deduced from it: cf. pea, chay, riches. It is hardly possible that the OE. ciris itself gave the ME. word.

Classical L. had cerasus cherry-tree, cerasum cherry, corresp. to Gr. κεράσις (also κεράσις, κεράσις) cherry-tree, κεράσιον cherry; according to the Roman writers, so called because brought by Lucullus from Cerasus in Pontus (though some refer the Gr. to κερα, horn). L. **Ceresia*, to which the Romanic and Teutonic names alike go back, was prob. an adj. form: its phonology is not evidenced; perh. there was a popular **ceresius* for cerasius, whence **cerasius* for cerasus. The sequence of forms in WGer. was app. keresja, kerisja, kirisja, kirissa, whence OE. cirise, ciris, cirs. All the Celtic names are either from Romanic, as Breton geres (Rostrenn) heras (Le Gonides), Welsh ceirios, ceirios (Davies) ceirios (Pughes); or from O. or ME., as Irish stris (= shirish) (O'Reilly), Gaelic ciris, stris, Manx shillish. The fact that there is no native name in Celtic or Teutonic confirms the opinion of botanists that the tree is not indigenous to Britain or Western Europe.]

I. 1. A well-known stone-fruit; the pulpy drupe of certain species (or a sub-genus) of Prunus (N. O. Rosaceæ). When used without qualification it usually means the fruit of the cultivated tree (Prunus Cerasus or Cerasus vulgaris); of this, two forms are now also found wild in Britain; the more distinct of these, the common Wild Cherry or Gean, is sometimes considered a separate species (P. Avium).

[OE. and ME. cherubin, ME. and mod. cherub; derived (through F., L., Gr.) from the Heb. of the OTest., where כְּרֻב k'rūb, pl. כְּרֻבִּים k'rūbīm, are used as explained below. (It has no root or certain etymology in Hebrew, and its derivation is disputed.) From Heb. the word was adopted without translation by the LXX as χερούβ, χερουβίμ (-iv, -elv), also in N.T., Heb. ix. 5, and by the Vulgate as cherub, cherubim, cherubim (the latter in the Clementine text). As the plural was popularly much better known than the sing. (e.g. in the Te Deum), the Romanic forms were all fashioned on cherubin, viz. It. cherubino, pl. -i, Sp. querubin, -es, Pg. querubin, cherubin, F. cherubin, pl. -s. The earliest Eng. instances are of cerubin, cherubin, taken over from ecclesiastical Latin apparently as a foreign word, and treated implicitly as a singular, sometimes as a proper name, at other times as a collective. From the ME. period, the popular forms were, as in French, cherubin sing., cherubins plural. Cherubim survived in popular use to the 18th c.; but in the Bible translations, cherub was introduced from the Vulgate by Wyclif, was kept up by the 16th c. translators, and gradually drove cherubin into the position of an illiterate form. In the plural, cherubins is found from the 13th c.; and although in MSS. of the earlier Wyclifite version, cherubyn is more frequent (after the Vulgate), the later version has always cherubins; this was retained in ordinary use till the 17th c. But in the 16th c., acquaintance with the Heb. led Bible translators to substitute cherubims: this occurs only once in Coverdale, but always in the Bishops' Bible and version of 1611. From the beginning of the 17th c., cherubim began to be preferred by scholars (e.g. Milton) to cherubins, and has gradually taken its place; the Revised Version of 1881-5 has adopted it. A native plural cherubs arose early in the 16th c.; in Tindale, Coverdale and later versions (but not in that of 1611) it occurs beside cherubins, -ims; it is now the ordinary individual plural, the Biblical cherubim being more or less collective.

Briefly then, cherubin, cherubins are the original English forms, as still in French. But, in the process of Biblical translation, cherubim has been supplanted by cherub; and cherubins has been 'improved' successively to cherubims, cherubim; while, concurrently, cherub has been popularly fitted with a new plural cherubs.

The foreign form of the plural, coupled with the vagueness of the meaning in many passages, led to curious grammatical treatment even in MSS. of the LXX: here the Heb. sing. and pl. are normally reproduced as χερούβ, χερουβίμ (the latter taken in Gen. iii. 24 as a neuter plural, as it is in Heb. ix. 5), yet in Ps. xviii. 10 and the duplicate passage in 2 Sam. xxii. 11, and in 2 Chron. iii. 11, the Heb. sing. כְּרֻב (of the Masoretic text) is represented by χερουβίμ, treated as a neuter singular (ἐν τῷ χερουβίμ, τοῦ χερουβίμ, τοῦ ἐρεβού). In the former case the Vulgate follows the LXX with cherubim. Since, in the Latin, there is, in many passages, nothing to show the number of cherubim, it is no cause of surprise that readers often took it as singular, and it is actually used as a sing. (masc. or neuter) in many mediæval Latin hymns and litanies.]

The history of the sense, or notion attached to the word, lies outside English, though English use reflects all its varieties. In the OTest. the cherubim are 'living creatures' with two or four wings, but the accounts of their form are not consistent: cf. the earlier notices with those of Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. i. x). They first appear in Genesis iii. 24, as guardians of the tree of life. This name was also given to the two images overlaid with gold placed with wings expanded over the mercy-seat in the Jewish tabernacle and temple, over which the shekinah or symbol of the divine presence was manifested. A frequent expression for the Divine Being was 'he that dwelleth (or sitteth) between (or on) the cherubim'. Psalm xviii. 10 (also contained in 2 Sam. xxii. 11) says of Jehovah 'He rode upon a cherub (LXX. cherubim), and did fly'. It is in connexion with this class of passages that the word first appears in English, and it is difficult to know exactly how the word was construed or used. The inclusion of the cherubim among angels appears to belong to Christian Mysticism. According to the 4th c. work attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, the heavenly beings are divided into three hierarchies, each containing three orders or choirs, viz. (according to the received order) seraphim, cherubim, thrones; dominions, virtues (δυνάμεις), powers; principalities, archangels, angels. Cherubim were thus made the second of the nine orders, having the special attribute of knowledge and contemplation of divine things. Their angelic character is that which chiefly prevails in later notions and in Christian art.

2. In extant use: A being of a celestial or angelic order.

a. One of the 'living creatures' mentioned in the Old Testament, and figured in the Jewish Temple.

b. One of the second order of angels of the Dionysian hierarchy, reputed to excel specially in knowledge (as the seraphim in love); a conventional representation of such an angelic being in painting or sculpture.

As the Christian notion was simply super-imposed as a kind of gloss upon the Hebrew, the two are not usually separable in med. L. or Eng. Milton completely blends them, as did e.g. Durandus in his Rationale Divinorum Officiorum (1286). In early Christian art, cherubim were app. coloured red, but according to some, blue, the seraphim being red. In modern art, a cherub is usually represented as a beautiful winged child, or as consisting of a child's head with wings but no body.

Chickling<sup>2</sup>, chichling (tj'kling, tj'itling). Forms: 6 cich(e)lynge, cichelinge, 6-8 cichling, 7-8 chichling, 8 chichaling; 7- chickling. [In 16th c. cicheling, chicheling, dim. of ciche, CHIORE, formed to represent Lat. cicerula as dim. of cicera. Altered in 18th c. to chickling.

(It is doubtful whether the alteration was intended, or merely due to an error; chickling occurs in Wilkins 1668, perh. a misprint; Kersey's Dict. 1708-21 has chickling; so Bailey 1721, but from 1731 onwards the edd. have chickling; this was app. a misprint, for Bailey's folio of 1730-36 retains chickling, which also occurs in writers as late as 1750. The Index to Miller's Gardener's Dict. 1759 has chickling, but the text chickling (about 35 times under Lathyrus). Britten and Holland adopt the form cichling.)

A name given by Turner to the Common cultivated Vetch (Lathyrus sativus), largely grown in England for fodder, but in the south of Europe as pulse. Black Cichlynge: Turner's name for the allied Lathyrus Cicera, Lesser Chick Pea, Flat-podded Vetch; the cicra of OF., L. cicera.

Child (tʃɪld), sb. Pl. children (tʃɪˈldrən). Forms: Sing. 1 child, 2- child; also 2 cyld, 2-6 chylid, (4 child), 4-6 chylde, 4-7, 9 (arch. in sense 5) childe, (5 schylid); see also CHILDE. Pl.: see below. [OE. cild neut. = OTeut. type **kilpa* (OE. -ld from OTeut. -lp) from root **kilp*-, whence also Goth. kilpei womb, inkilpō pregnant woman. Not found elsewhere: in the other WGer. langs. its place is taken by kind.

As the form of OHG., OS., OFris. kind is not satisfactorily explained from the root ken (Aryan gen- 'beget, bear', and is for LG. at least quite irregular, Prof. Sievers suggests the possibility that kind is a perversion of cild, kild, by assimilation to the derivatives of root ken-, which may have spread from OHG. to OS. and Fris.

The OE. plural was normally cild; but in late OE. the word was partly assimilated to the neuter -os stems, making nom. pl. cildru, -ra, and esp. gen. pl. cildra. Ælfric, Grammar 23, gives nom. cild, gen. cildra, dat. cildum; but he also has nom. cildru (e.g. Hom. II. 324). No r forms occur in the earlier Vesp. Psalter nor in Northumbrian. The latter had cild and cildo; and sometimes made the word masc. with pl. cildas. In ME. there are rare instances of chylid, childe as plural; but the surviving type was OE. cildru, cildra, which gave ME. childe, childer: this was the regular northern and north midland form, and is still used in the dialects as far south as Shropsh., Leicester, and Lincolnsh. But in the south this was made childer-en, childre-n by conformation to the -en plurals: cf. brethre, brether, brethren, plurals of BROTHER. This has become the standard and literary form. The Old Northumbrian cildas is paralleled by chilides in 15th c., which is exceptional; but the Sc. differentiated word CHILD has always chields in plural.]

B. Signification.

I. With reference to state or age.

1. The unborn or newly born human being; foetus, infant. App. originally always used in relation to the mother as the 'fruit of the womb'.

When the application was subsequently extended, the primitive sense was often expressed by babe, baby, infant; but 'child' is still the proper term, and retained in phrases, as 'with child', 'to have a child', 'child-birth', the verb to child, etc.

† 5. A youth of gentle birth: used in ballads, and the like, as a kind of title. arch. When used by modern writers, commonly archaically spelt chylde or childe, for distinction's sake.

The precise force with which cild was used in OE. is not certain: Mr. Freeman (Norm. Cong. I. v. 374 note) merely concludes that 'it is clear that it was a title of dignity'. In 13th and 14th c. 'child' appears to have been applied to a young noble awaiting knighthood: e.g. in the romances of Ipomydon, Sir Tryamour, Torrent of Portugal, etc.

b. It has been pointed out that child or my child is by parents used more frequently (and longer) of, and to, a girl than a boy. Shakspeare nowhere uses 'my child' of or to a son, but frequently of or to a daughter.

This is possibly connected with the use in 1 b; but is perhaps more due to the facts that girl has a wider range of application than boy, and that a daughter is more dependent on parental protection.

Chiltern (tʃɪltən), Also 6 chylturne, chilturne, 8 chilturn. [Chiltern occurs as a proper name in the OE. Chron. anno 1009; but also, since 16th c., applied to a kind of soil or country. This may be from the proper name, though the converse is also possible; at present no explanation of the word is known.]

1. Proper name of a range of hills, in some parts wooded, which extend from the south of Oxfordshire, near Wallingford, quite across Buckinghamshire into Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire.

1225 O. E. Chron. (Laud MS.) an. 1009 Ða æfter middan wintra hi namon þa ænne upgang ut þurh Chiltern, and swa to Oxneforda. 1747 CARTE Hist. Eng. I. 483 The woodlands on the edge of Bucks and Hertfordshire, called the Chiltern.

2. Chiltern Hundreds: a name given to five (or more strictly four and a half) hundreds in Oxfordshire, and three in Buckinghamshire, which contain the Chiltern Hills. The manorial rights of these belonged to the Crown, which appointed over them Stewards and Bailiffs. These offices have long been obsolete or merely nominal, but that of the three Buckinghamshire hundreds (Stoke, Desborough, and Burnham) is the best known of several fictitious offices, now used for a special purpose. No member of parliament is by law at liberty to resign his seat, so long as he is duly qualified; on the other hand, a member who accepts an office of profit under the Crown must vacate his seat, subject to re-election. A member desiring to resign therefore applies for the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, or other similar appointment, which is, by a legal fiction, held to be such an office; the appointment necessitates his resignation, and, having thus fulfilled its purpose, is again resigned, so as to be ready for conferment upon the next member that wishes to make the same use of it.

The holding of an office of profit under the Crown became a disqualification in 1707. It was not till 1740 that the Stewardship of a royal manor was used in order to create a disqualification. In that year Sir Watkin Wynne took the Stewardship of H. M. Lordship and Manor of Bromfield and Yale (which was again taken in 1740). In 1744 Ld. Middlesex took the Head Stewardship of H. M. Honour of Offord in Kent. In Jan. 1750-51 John Pitt, M.P. for Wrexham, took the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, which has come to be the ordinary form, except when a second resignation takes place before this is vacant.

Chime (tʃaim), sb.<sup>1</sup> Forms: 3-4 chymbe, chimb, 4-6 chyme, 4, 7 chim, 5 chymme, (6 chyme, cheime), 4-chime. [This and the verb of same form are of somewhat obscure history; but they were evidently derived in some way from L. cymbalum CYMBAL, in OE. cimbal, cimbala, which would naturally give a ME. **chimb*, **chimb*. Cf. also MHG. zimbel, zimel m. and n., zimbele f. 'a small bell struck with a hammer.' But while ME. chime, chime, chim agrees with the first part of cimbal, the loss of the latter part is not clearly accounted for (cf. however nuch, lite, badde, from nuchel, litel, bæddel). Chimbe may however have been from OF.: Godefroy has a single instance of chime = cymbal. As to the passages in which 'cymbal' is expressed by chymbe belle, chymme belle, these may indicate that a ME. **chimb* was thus popularly understood and divided, making chime or chim a distinct word; but, on the other hand, if chime or chim already existed, the analysis of cimbal as chime bell would be equally natural. The following are the instances in question:

c 1300 K. Alis. 1852 Anon he doth his bemen blowe, v. c. [500] on a throwe. Hi, chymbe belle he doth rynde, And doth dassche gret taborynge. c 1440 Promp. Paro. 75 Ch(y)mme belle [H. P. chyme bell], cimbalum.

From the persistence of the medial i in OF. it is seen that the word was not an ancient popular word, but a very early adoption of caminata with subsequent phonetic evolution. As the usual sense in med.L. is 'room with a fireplace', it is assumed that this was short for camera caminata. The sequence of senses as seen in It., Fr., and Eng. is 'room with a fireplace', 'fireplace', 'smoke-vent over a fireplace'.]

II. China porcelain, China-ware, china.

[Throughout India, and the East generally, the Persian name چینی is widely diffused as chīnī, in the sense of 'porcelain', 'china-ware'. From India this form and use of the word was prob. introduced in the 17th c. into England, whence the spellings 7 chiney, cheny, cheneey, chenea, mod. dial. chaneey, cheenie, and the fashionable pronunciation of last and beginning of the present century, tʃɪˈni (see Walker), which with tʃɪni, tʃɪˈni, still survives in the dialects.]

3. A species of earthenware of a fine semi-transparent texture, originally manufactured in China, and first brought to Europe in the 16th c. by the Portuguese, who named it porcelain. Early in 18th c. it began to be manufactured in Europe.

a. China-ware (which naturally occurs earlier than China) had at first the literal sense of 'ware from China'. This was soon shortened to China, and as the shortened form became gradually the common name of the material, 'china-ware' came to be regarded as 'ware made of china or porcelain', the sense it now bears.

For the Romance word Diez suggests an adoption of OHG. scina, MHG. schine, which, among other things, meant 'needle, splinter', perh. originally 'small piece of bone or metal'. The transition of sense would be parallel to that of L. spina, prickly, fishbone, backbone, and Ger. grat; the difficulty being the want of evidence, either in German or Romance, for this transition. (Scheler Anhang, to Diez quotes from an It.-Ger. Gloss. in Mussafia's schena, schin-kein shinbone, which may be thought to show some approximation.)

Chink (tʃɪŋk), sb.<sup>2</sup> Also 6 chynk (e, chyncke, 7 chinke. [This and its verb, CHINK v.<sup>2</sup>, are known only from the 16th c. There is nothing similar in Teutonic or Romanic.

In sense, chink is exactly equivalent to the earlier word CHINE (sb.<sup>1</sup>), and indeed its earliest known occurrence is in Bertheler's ed. of a work, where it has been substituted for chine, chynne of earlier MSS. and edd. And, although 'chynes and chynkes' occurs in 1545-64, it may be said that, generally, chink took the place of chine, between 1550 and 1580. It thus looks like a new formation on chine; but no satisfactory account of its origin can at present be offered. If chink, CHINK, is, as it appears to be, a variant of the verb, the whole may have to be referred to an earlier date.

Professor Skeat thinks it 'formed with an added & expressive of 'diminution'; but examples of this process in 15-16th c. are not known.

Wedgwood would identify it with CHINK<sup>3</sup>, with the root notion of a sharp shrill sound, as in the chink of metal, and thence derive the sense of sudden fissure or fracture accompanied by such a sound. He compares the development of CRACK, 'sharp report' and then 'fissure', and of other words, in which actions are instinctively expressed by their associated sounds. (Cf. e.g. bang, bomb, bum, chap, clap, pop.) But the historical data are too scanty to establish this.]

[Note. The Harl MSS. 221 (c 1440) of Prompt Parv. has the entry 'Chynyn or chinken' wrythe bellys tintillo, which, if genuine, carries back the evidence for this word a century earlier. Unfortunately, the reading is not supported by the other MSS., some of which, like the King's Coll. and Winchester, have not the entry, while MS. Addit. 22, 586, like Fynson's and the other printed edd., has 'chymyn or clynke bellys, tintillo'. This and the treatment of Chynken farther on make it possible that chinken is a scribal error for chynken.]

Chirno, obs. form of CHURN.

Chiro, chir-, = Gr. χερῶν combining form of χερῶν hand, appearing in Greek in a very large number of words; several of these were adopted in Latin with the spelling chiro, e.g. chirographum, chironautia, chironomia, chirotheca, chirurgia, and have thus passed into the modern langs.; many more have been taken by these directly from Greek, e.g. chirocracy, chiroscopy, chirosofophy, chirotechny, or formed from Greek elements and on Greek analogies, as chiroplast, chirosofoper. In modern technical terms, esp. those of botany and zoology, the spelling is often cheir-, e.g. cheiranthus, cheiroptera, cheirotherium.

In words thoroughly naturalized in Latin, CH was treated as C, and had in Romanic the phonetic history of c before i: hence such med.L. forms as chirographum, chirogryllus, chirotheca, chironautia, chirurgianus, also written cyro-, and It. and OF. and Eng. forms in chiro, cyro-. But, in most words, modern scholarship has restored the ch-spelling and k pronunciation: see however CHIRURGON, SURGEON.

The more important of these derivatives follow in their alphabetical order; a few trivial ones are given here: Chirocosmetics sb. pl. [Gr. κοσμητικὸς; see COSMETIC], the art of adorning the hands. † Chirogram [see GRAM], used by Bulwer for a diagram illustrating chironomy. Chirogymnast [Gr. γυμναστής; see GYMNAST], an apparatus for exercising the fingers for pianoforte playing. Chiroromys, chiroromys [Gr. μῦς mouse], the AYE-AYE of Madagascar. Chiroplast [Gr. πλάστης moulder, modeller], an apparatus devised by J. B. Logier in 1814 for keeping the hands in a correct position in pianoforte playing; hence Chiroplastic a. Chiropoietic a. [Gr. ποιητικός making, f. ποιέω to make, do], ? surgical. † Chiroponal a. [Gr. νόσος toil + -AL], pertaining to or involving manual labour (obs.). † Chirosoopical a. [Gr. σκοπεῖν inspector, examiner], pertaining to palmistry.

Gr. χαιο-γραφον, -os (that which is) written with the hand, f. χαιο- hand- + -γραφος writing, written. It became a technical word in later L. (cf. Gaius iii. 134); its complete naturalization is shown by the prevalence of the form ciro-graphum, whence OF. and Eng. forms in ciro-, cyro-.]

1. Applied technically to various documents formally written, engrossed, or signed.

a. An indenture; = CHARTER-PARTY I; a deed of conveyance of land so indented. Obs. exc. Hist. [c. 1280 Charta Edm. I. in *Rotul. Chiropod: see CHIROPOD.

Chiropodist (χαιο-πόδιστ). [A factitious designation, apparently assumed in 1785; see first quote. Whether the inventor put together Gr. χαιρ, χαιο- hand, and ποδ, pod- foot, to indicate that hands and feet were the objects of his attention, or whether he had in view the ready-made Gr. χαιροπόδ-ης (or χαιρόπους, χαιροπόδ-) 'having chapped feet', does not appear. The latter would better justify his formation, the former better suit his meaning.

Gr. χαιροπόδ- is founded on χαιρ-ός a chap, properly of the hands (χαιρ) but also of the feet (χαιράδες ποδῶν).

One who treats diseases of the hands and feet; now usually restricted to one who treats corns and bunions' (Syd. Soc. Lex.).

Hence Chirpingly adv.

1650 A. B. Mutat. Polono 15 To be chirpingly drunk, and sing away sorrow.

3. Producing merriment, cheering.

[The original notion here is not quite clear: perhaps the word was properly a vbl. sb. used attrib., 'chirping-cup' being = cup (productive) of chirping. In later use the phrase is merely traditional, without analysis.]

c1645 HOWELL Let. 5 July 8 (1650) 162 The Fannian Law . . . allows a chirping cup to satiate, not to surfeit. 1693 W. ROBERTSON *Phrasol. Chirpy (tʃɪrpi), a. collog. [f. CHIRP + -Y 1.]

Given to chirping; cheerful, lively, merry, hilarious. (Cf. CHIRP v. 3.)

1837 J. BATES in Ht. Martineau Soc. Amer. III. 332 It makes me chirpy to think of Roseland. 1859 LANG Wand. India 19 The soup and a glass of wine set Jack up; and he becomes quite chirpy. 1882 BESANT All Sorts xx. 146 Her ladyship put quite a chirpy face upon it.

Chirr (tʃɪr, tʃɔr, dial. and Sc. tʃirr), v. [A modern formation naturally expressing a prolonged and somewhat sharply trilled sound: cf. whirr, birr, burr, purr; with chirring cf. the more ponderous jarring. As a recent onomatopoeia, chirr was evidently largely suggested by the already existing chirm, chirk, chirp, chirp, chirrup, of which it retains the common phonetic element and the common kernel of meaning.

Along with the subsequently formed chirl, and the many derivatives of chirp, etc., these form a well-marked recent group or 'family' of words, which mutually illustrate and help each other's meaning. Thus chirr expresses continued and uniform trilled sound; in chirk, chirt, chirp this sound is abruptly stopped by oral action; in chirrup, a modulation is introduced before the stoppage; chirl, esp. in its northern form chirr, suggests the passing of the chirr into a warbling modulation; while chirp, with its suggestions of verbal sbs. in -u of diverse origin, e.g. screeam, blowm, blossom, chirch, spasm, assumes the appearance of a derivative of chir-. If these words, instead of being nearly all recent, were of prehistoric formation, or of Aryan standing, chirr would certainly be assumed as the 'root', and the other words as out-growths from it.]

intr. To make the trilled sound characteristic of grasshoppers, etc. (Often nearly equivalent to CHIRP, but properly expressing a more continuous and monotonous sound.) Hence Chirring vbl. sb. and vbl. a.

1639 GLAPTHORNE Argalus & P. II. i. As Swans . . . who do bill, With tardy modesty, and chirring plead Their constant resolutions. 1648 HERRICK Heper. (Grosart) II. 24 The chirring Grasshopper. 1834 PRINGLE *Afr. Chirrie, obs. form of CHERRY.

Chirrup (tʃɪrɪp), v. Forms: 6 cherip, 7 cherrip, cherup, 7-9 cherup, 7- chirrup.

[Evidently formed from chirp, by trilling the r, and developing an additional syllable, to indicate a corresponding variation of sound. But it was thus brought into phonetic association with cheer, cheerful, cheer up, which have acted powerfully upon its sense-development, so that chirrup now conveys a more sprightly or cheery notion than chirp.]

1. intr. Of birds, etc.: To chirp, esp. with a more sustained and lively effect, approaching to twittering or warbling.

1579 [see CHIRUPING vbl. sb.] 1637 G. DANIEL Genius of this Isle 358 Bld ds cherup in the woods, And mingle notes. 1649 — Triumph. c. slang. To cheer or applaud (public performers) for a consideration. Hence Chirrupe = F. claqueur.

1883 Pall Mall G. 6 Mar. 4/3 A 'chirrupe' . . . excused himself at the Lambeth police-court yesterday by alleging that 'he thought there was no harm in it'. Ibid. 9 Mar. 14/3 Chirruping, As to the etymology of the word, the French argot for blackmail is chantage. Such paltry operations as those reported from the Lambeth music-hall do not merit the description of singing—they are simply twittering or 'chirruping'. 1888 J. FAYN in Illustr. Lond. News 17 Mar. 266 The . . . singers in music-halls cannot . . . do without him (the 'chirrupe').

3. intr. To speak or sing in sprightly tones.

gla: see CHIRURGY. In later OF. serurgien, contracted surgien, whence Eng. sirurgien, surgien, now corruptly surgeon. The Renaissance brought back to Fr. and Eng. (partly also to It.) the spelling chir, but never to French the pronunciation with k, which has now established itself in Eng., largely because the word being no longer in popular use, the traditional pronunciation has yielded to a new one, founded immediately upon the Gr. The original ending which would normally give mod.

chirurgian, was variously perverted in 16th c., and finally settled down in its present form: cf. SUR-

GEON. The result of these successive re-formations and perversions is that the modern kaiˈrʌdʒən is, strictly, a different word from ME. sirurdiĝen, though it would be difficult to draw a chronological line between the two.]

One whose profession it is to cure bodily diseases and injuries by manual operation; a SURGEON.
